REACH is committed to improving the health-care system in Ghana and promoting equal access to quality health-care for all by: supplementing health-care resources, engaging and empowering members of the community, and advocating for, and helping to develop sustainable approaches to health-care delivery. Screenathon is an initiative designed to bring together hundreds of volunteers for an extraordinary day of service and provision of health-care and health education services for an under-served community. Volunteers who participate in Screenathon and the donors who sponsor them have the opportunity to make a tangible and lasting impact to the health of the targeted communities in Ghana.

Our 2010 Screenathon targets Glefe, a coastal community near Dansoman in the Greater Accra Region. The Glefe community suffers from poor sanitary and overcrowded living conditions, which is primarily a result of the impoverishment that afflicts the people and their environment. Glefe's population is predominantly young, with a median age of 22; hence the largest burden of disease is born by children and infants. REACH's Screenathon will provide health-care and health education services to the Glefe community to impact malaria, diarrhoeal and respiratory illnesses, among others.

Overall, in line with millennium development goals 4 and 7, REACH hopes to achieve significant improvement in lives of children and slum dwellers in Ghana.
